Dear Mr. Colby,

Last summer and this fall I asked Mr. Thuermer on behalf of the J.B. Moore Society if you would come to speak at the University of Virginia School of Law. He said at the time that your schedule was too full to permit an engagement. We would still very much like to have you come down to Charlottesville and hope that you might have more time now.

The J.B. Moore Society is the oldest law student organization devoted to the study of international law in the United States. Each year we host a number of distinguished speakers. Among our speakers last fall was Lawrence Houston, who I am sure could tell you about the hospitality and enthusiasm with which he was received.

Because of differences in the undergraduate and law school calendars, April would be the best month for a visit. Charlottesville is at its best during that month, with spring in full blossom. We do not pay an honorarium but would be most happy to take care of your travel expenses and meals and lodgings. We could arrange your participation in some classes, if you wished, and tailor the size of your audience and publicity for your speech to meet your requirements.

I read yesterday in the Times that you were considering a refresher course in legal developments as a prelude to resuming your career in the law. This might be another good reason for visiting us during the spring!

I hope we will be hearing from you soon.

Respectfully,

Paul B. Stephan
